This passage plays a key role in the Gospel according to Mark's understanding of why Jesus dies and what his death means.

It describes the Christian gospel and the community it creates as utterly different from the "business as usual" we encounter all around us. At the same time, Jesus' words in are often misconstrued and made to support theological proposals that are foreign to Mark's Gospel. Preachers therefore find themselves given a choice opportunity to get to the heart of the matter of Jesus' death and what it means for our discipleship..

Jesus gives his final and most detailed prediction of his trial, suffering, death, and resurrection (compare the less formal references to death yet to come in He is about to enter Jerusalem (and confront the temple-based aristocracy. James and John request privileged places of authority in seats at Jesus' right and left. In doing so, the sons of Zebedee appear to have missed everything Jesus has said and done They recognize that glorification awaits Jesus. The authority he has exhibited in his ministry will lead to something big, perhaps to a royal rule, and they conspire to capitalize on that.

When Jesus softly chastises the two for their ignorance and speaks about "the cup" he must drink and "the baptism" he must undergo, he reiterates that violence and death await him in Jerusalem. Mark's Gospel emphasizes that such rejection and death are inevitable and required, because of who Jesus is, because of the boundary-breaking character of his ministry, and because those who wield power in the world will do all they can to protect themselves and their prerogatives from the implications of that ministry.
